Always nervous and enthusiastic, he seemed like a crazy man at times, and Pepe, accus-tomed as he was to his moods, looked at him sometimes in amazement. His one desire was to fight, and of this he talked At last the day came and with it the battle of Puente Grande, which practi-cally ended the "revolution of the governors." Under Herran the government troops marched out of Bogota to the bridge, and there after a hard fight defeated the energy. This was on the 28th of October, 1840.

At his own request, preferred to Gen. Herrap, Rafael had been promised a chance to lead at least one charge if any should be unide. A company of the enemy had taken up position behind a low wall, to the left as you go westward from the bridge, and from this cover were annoying the government troops with a galling fire. Gen. Herran decided that at all cost they must be dislodged. In their position they could not be flanked, and there was but one thing to do-charge on them over the wall. Mindful of his promise, the general sent an aid, and ordered Capt, Cordoba to undertake the work, supported by Capt. Sanchez. When the order was given to the two young men Rafael flushed with excitement, and wringing Pepe's hand ordered his men out in front, while his ess nervous friend took up a supporting position in the rear. Waving his sword Rafael sprang forward.

The bridge he was forced to cross was "Nearly everybody in this county is familiar with the Morehouse tract. It includes a body of land lying in the Straight Creek Valley and embracing 50,000 acres. Away back in 1789, it is claimed that this land was granted to one Abram Morehouse. Since then the property has been divided and sold and resold, and is now owned and occupied by a number of different parties. The heirs of Abram Morehouse are still clinging to the hope that they can establish some claim to the property, and vey and locate the tract. All of these have failed, as the people who have settled the land and established their homes have invariably driven off every surveying party which has made the attempt to locate the boundaries. The intrepid engineer who has been found to volunteer to make the survey hails from Kansas City. He says that he will want any posse or troops to guard him. Such is the feeling on this particular Morehouse Survey among the citizens of Straight Creek, that if Mr. Dornblasser succeeds in his undertaking he
